"A Terrible Beauty – Works of Edward Wilson (1872 - 1912) artist, explorer, naturalist and doctor on the Scott expeditions to Antarctica "

On 12 September 1912 the frozen body of Edward Wilson was discovered alongside those of his companions Scott and Bowers. They had perished on their return from the South Pole, not far short of their supply depot and potential safety. Wilson was the expedition doctor and Chief Scientific Officer. He was, also, an accomplished artist and a deeply religious man, and a firm follower of Ruskin's writings. Over the course of ten years he captured the terrible beauty of Antarctica in all its moods.

Isobel Williams is an author and biographer with an interest in polar exploration. Like Wilson, she studied medicine at St George's Hospital, London, where she discovered Wilson's work. As a doctor, she pursued a career in respiratory medicine and the training of young doctors.
